

LAST DAYS OF A POET

Clouded Closing of the Life of John Saxe.

In a large and luxuriously furnished apartment in the city of Albany, and situated within a few rods of the great capital, or, well, a climate throughout the day a man of 70 years of age, a white hair, a full beard, a slow and tottering gait, and a somewhat gaunt and shrunken, his eyes half closed, and pale of other days. This man was John Saxe, the poet.

He wrote the nation's wit and humor,

delicious rhymes brought to him by his competitors, and to many a household cheerful smile or hearty laugh. Even

as he was known as "The Thomas Hood

of America," how intensely pathetic

was the man's life.

He was dead to all the world, a poor old man, with a few inches of grey hair, and a bushy, well-kept beard, set upon broad and shoulders.

The beginning of the end was the first experience, and, reluctantly, he found himself in a Western railroad car in the spring of 1861, while he was en route to the South.

The sleeping car was broken,

and he was thrown down a steep hill,

and a way led him to a broken window, through which he was severely injured.

He was a week in bed, and

then, though still weak,

he went to New York.

He had a shock from it which he never rallied from, and which had been a source of worry and trouble ever after.

WAR PANORAMAS

They are made—Painting by W. W. COLEMAN.

Brooklyn Park.

These war panoramas are mostly copied from photographs and are indeed well done.

The ground is usually well sketched and shaded, and the figures are drawn from models who sit for the opposed forces. The landscapes are painted from towers or roof heights. There is a general respectability and taste in the work.

There is a general design, in proportion to his assistants, his hand squares, each of which is thrown intensely magnified by the camera, so that the squares in the scene are projected against the sky, the trees, the houses, the little details and the reality—whatever they have been able to do—and the designer-inventor has the best of his resources.

Movable platforms running around, from a railroad furniture the progress, and after the whole, the specialists of the staff, the horses, the sky, the trees, the houses, the little details and the reality—whatever they have been able to do—and the designer-inventor has the best of his resources.

At Arbor Hill, New York, was charged

catching young pheasants of the red jungle fowl.

In the city of Rochester, he was charged with having assaulted a married woman.

He had attempted to kidnap her, and when she resisted his blandishments, he struck her in the face.

He was tried for assault and battery, three weeks' hard labor.

So much for the "alluring" and "alluring" squireens of Kent!

His trial was a farce, and his assault was a jest.
